"I write about ordinary people and their experiences with the justice system, with the professionals – the police, prosecutors, judges, those who run our jails, prisons and correctional programs, those who defend the accused and, most importantly, those most adversely effected by the system.

I want to discover what justice really looks like for the average person and for those who have been caught up in the system. I found that people were willing to talk about their experiences. These conversations, my own observations and impressions, and other discoveries have ended on the Justice Diary, and in my book "The Justice Diary – An Inquiry into Justice in America."
